

The making of an advocate

At some point in life we all must make a choice and stand up for something. Regardless of the consequences, we must undertake the venture. What could make a man enter an arena as an "unqualified" neophyte, face the perils of federal litigation "unrepresented by counsel," and emerge victorious?-- obtaining up to ten appeals in one system without reading one law book prior to 1992 and then take that claim, per se, and present it in a forum, that most attorneys believed impossible—The United States District Court.

How could one man take on the United States Postal Service since 1983 and ultimately secure a stipulated multi-million dollar, non-jury action against the United States of America? How does an ordinary man acquire the special skills in strategy, negotiating, and manipulation required to render three different Assistant United States Attorneys virtually "incompetent?" The making of an advocate: An exposé detailing the twenty year saga of one man's personal and legal valor in the pursuit of justice can answer all these questions.

Due to the voluminous records created, this book has the added potential for conversion into a series of books, magazine abstracts, and screenplay as well. The focus of The making of an advocate will be from a microcosm as client, attorney, and advocate all wrapped into one; a perspective that few authors can boast.

Provides a refreshing post O.J. facelift:

- Chronologs various aspects of the author's life
- Including his tumultuous personal relationships
- The stakes and the players in the game
- The legal maneuverings
- The behind the scenes strategy
- Jefferson vs. U.S.A.
- Jefferson vs. Reno et al.
- Jefferson vs. U.S. Department of Justice
- Jefferson vs. U.S. Department of Labor
- Jefferson vs. U.S. Postal Service
- And Much Much More

The making of an advocate highlights that, much too frequently, the recipient of governmental, journalistic and corporate tyranny is the average man.”¹
